Working Papers

“Regulatory Capture via Relative Prices.” (Job Market Paper)

Under monopolistic competition, regulations that raise costs non-uniformly across the productivity distribution reallocate demand toward high-productivity firms. Applied to minimum wages, this explains why firms already paying above the floor expand and gain market share following increases.

“Across CES.”

CES share functions have an exact representation as log-logistic distribution functions in own price. This provides a constructive approach to building flexible demand systems that nest CES while allowing for richer substitution patterns.

“Living with Density: The Impacts of California’s By-Right Permitting for Accessory Dwelling Units.” With Philip Hoxie.

Using a difference-in-discontinuities design exploiting the California Coastal Zone as a regulatory boundary, we find that ADU permitting roughly doubles after California’s by-right reforms, with option value capitalizing into land prices at 5–10%.

“Inputs and the School Quality Effects of Targeted Vouchers.” With Cristián Sánchez.

Chile’s targeted voucher (SEP) increases school spending on instructional materials and personnel, with modest positive effects on test scores concentrated in lower-income schools.

“Price Effects of a Targeted Voucher Reform.” With Cristián Sánchez, Francisco Garrido, and Emiliano Ramírez.

The additional per-student funding from Chile’s SEP voucher is partially passed through to higher private school tuition, suggesting schools capture part of the subsidy increase through pricing.
